PREFACE.

AS a school of medicine we profess to have a distinctive practice, unlike either our old school or homeopathic neighbors. We claim to use different remedies, or in different form and dose, and for different effects. We boldly claim a more successful practice than either of our competitors, and this claim can only be based upon different principles, a different therapeutics, and a different materia medica.

We must, therefore, have distinctive books which clearly state our methods of practice. Old-school works will not serve this purpose, neither will homeopathic. With the pretensions we make, if we can not show that we have such works, and depend upon them, we are frauds of the first magnitude.

In the early days of Eclecticism, the need of text-books was clearly seen, and great sacrifices were made to furnish them. The writers toiled without pay, and to publish the earlier works they practiced the most rigid economy for years to command the money. By these means we had Beach's works, Jones and Morrow's Practice, King's Dispensatory, and some others. The making of books was not an easy nor a profitable job.

Now we have a full list of text-books, or books of reference, and by frequent revision they are kept fully up to our practice of to-day. They have been very successful, more so than any American books in the market, and this is the best evidence of their value. They are bought by all schools of medicine, and when bought they are brought into active use.

"No one point is more universally denied by American people than the EXCLUSIVE RIGHT of one set of men to judge of and have sole control in any thing. Persecution or proscription for opinion's sake is not tolerated in political or religious matters, and certainly should not be in those pertaining to medicine."
